EW ARTICLES

Making the most of the euro

by Joaquin Almunia

The euro has been something of a political scapegoat despite its runaway success, says Joaquin Almunia. But the EU's Commissioner for Economic and Monetary Affairs warns that as it approaches its second decade the time is now for eurozone governments to live up to their responsibilities and fully coordinate their economic policies

Responding to Ireland's "no": Public opinion must see that the treaty underpins our diversity

by Constantine Simiitis

The issue I see as crucial is the relationship between the supranational and the national; how can we preserve diversity while also pursuing the common aims of the people of Europe?

Is Britain a European nation?

by Stephen Wall

The British may be troublesome and reluctant Europeans, writes former UK ambassador to the EU Stephen Wall, but they are also conscientious, having championed the Single Market, economic reform, free trade and enlargement

Why nobody loves Europe (2)

by Jorgo Chatzimakakis

EU-level policymaking has lost its way and needs an abrupt change of course, believes Jorgo Chatzimakakis who sits on the European Parliament's Industry Committee. He argues that discredited and inadequate national loyalties must give way to a new European patriotism
