

- Home
- World
- US
- UK
- Europe
- Asia-Pacific
- Middle East & Africa
- Americas
- International economy
- Brussels briefing
- News headlines
- News in depth
- Business
- Markets
- Markets data & tools
- Industries
- Lex
- Comment & analysis
- Technology
- Management
- Your money
- Arts & Weekend
- Sport
- Jobs & classifieds
- In today's FT

- FT Reports
- Creative Business
- FTfm
- FT-IT
- World reports
- Business reports

Careers
We repaired the way
Assess interests and skills online

- News in depth
- Rebuilding Iraq
- WMD guide
- Science briefing
- China
- Terror

- Columnists
- Martin Wolf
- Lucy Kellaway
- Philip Stephens
- Quentin Peel
- Lombard
- Gerard Baker
- Amity Shlaes

World / Brussels briefing

Αρχείο Colinas

Print article | Email

EU Irish presidency seeks new Delors as Commission head

By George Parker in Brussels
Published: December 28 2003 17:56 | Last Updated: December 28 2003 17:56

The incoming Irish presidency of the European Union is seeking an efficient technocrat in the style of master administrator Jacques Delors to rebuild the reputation of the European Commission, the guardian of the European Community and EU treaties.

The Irish government will next month start taking soundings in national capitals about who should replace Romano Prodi as European Commission president when his term of office expires next October.

But Irish officials are making it clear they will not be bound by the recent convention that Commission presidents should automatically come from the ranks of former EU leaders.

They point out that Mr Delors, a former French finance minister, was the most successful and authoritative holder of the post in recent years.

"You don't need a political colossus there, you need a technocratic guy who has the confidence of the political heads of the union," said a senior Irish official.

"We don't buy the argument that whatever major luminary is leaving office, about to leave office or about to get kicked out of office, should be put up for this job."

There is no clear frontrunner for the job among former or current EU leaders. Jean-Claude Juncker of Luxembourg, Paavo Lipponen of Finland, Guy Verhofstadt of Belgium and Costas Simitis of Greece are among the names most frequently mentioned.

Ομοίως και η FAZ.

Among the alternative candidates likely to be floated by Ireland, which will hold the EU presidency for six months, are Antonio Vitorino, the Portuguese justice and home affairs commissioner, and Günter Verheugen, the German enlargement commissioner, both of whom have shone in their current jobs.

Pat Cox, the Irish president of the European parliament, might be another candidate, although Dublin could not be seen to be pushing its own man. A skilled political operator, he has pushed through a painful pay and expenses reform package at the parliament.

Jacques Delors was so influential that EU leaders decided that only former heads of government could hope to match his stature and maintain the Commission president's high profile when he stepped down in 1995.

However, the experience has been the opposite. Jacques Santer, the former Luxembourg prime minister, was seen as ineffectual and his Commission had to resign in disgrace in 1999 because of a series of financial scandals.

Romano Prodi, a former Italian prime minister, is well regarded in Italy but his influence among EU heads of government is low, and the Commission's standing generally remains at a low ebb.

Some diplomats say Mr Prodi's inability to shape events, particularly at the European Council - the summits of EU leaders - stems from his lack of grasp of detail.

Subscribe to FT.com

Sign up now Take a tour

Username

Password

Remember me Log

Search & quotes

-
- News
- Quotes
- Power search
- My portfolio

Stability pact

Euro's rule book explain

FT briefing

EU enlargement

Treaty

Does Europe need a constitution?

CAP reform

Key points

Discussion

Italy's EU presidency

Discussion

Is EU reform possible?

FT/ College of Europe

Writing competition

Timeline

