The homesick King

The exiled King Constantine of Greece could get his royal estates back, thanks to a European court ruling. He hopes to live in his palace again, but is reconciled to losing his throne. 'If you feel bitter, you cannot survive,' he says

Helena de Bertodano

on the wall of King Constantine's study is not the most impressive of the paintings in his Hampstead house. But it underlines the intimacy between the King of Greece and the British Royal Family. It was painted by the Prince of Wales nearly 20 years ago during his honeymoon

The boat was steaming past Crete as he painted it and he sent it to me from there," says Constantine. It bears no signature, just the name of the place, Marmara Bay, and the date, 1981

When he first pointed it out to me. I had thought he was indicat-ing a neighbouring picture, an impressive landscape "Ha, ha, " chuckles Constantine. "I don't think Charles is that good. The Prince of Wales's painting is more amateurish: broad brushstrokes depicting the sea-and a blur of passing land.

Much as Constantine likes his British royal relatives, he has had to spend rather more time on their soil than he would have chosen. Since 1974, he has lived in exile in London, stripped of his throne, his court, his palace. Last week, however, the Euro-pean Court of Human Rights ruled that his private property had been illegally seized by the estates must be returned or the government will have to pay him compensation, estimated by the King at £1.2 billion, which includes 34,000 acres of woodland, the royal palace at Tatoi and the summer palace of Mon Repus on Corfu, where his cousin the Duke of Edinburgh was born. When Larrive at his house.

several inviterious figures in suits greet me and file into the coom for the interview.

Constantine himself is affable and informal and does not stand in ceremony. His aides had told me Eshould address him as

Your Majesty", but thought a hirtsy might be a little excessive He is wearing a dark suit and black tie with gold-rimmed glasses and gold ER cufflinks. In fact, although his home could scarcely he described as a palace (it is a redbrick 1960s house in Hampstead Garden Suburb, just round the corner from Jonathan Ross's new house, with an acre of garden backing on to the Heath) there is certainly a regal theme. with gold as the dominant colour.

The carpets throughout the house are gold, the paint on the walls is pale gold, the curtains are striped gold and rose, the sofa and armchairs are gold with pale blue piping. Even the bath-room has a gold basin with gold taps and gold flecked wallpaper. We sit in the drawing-room.

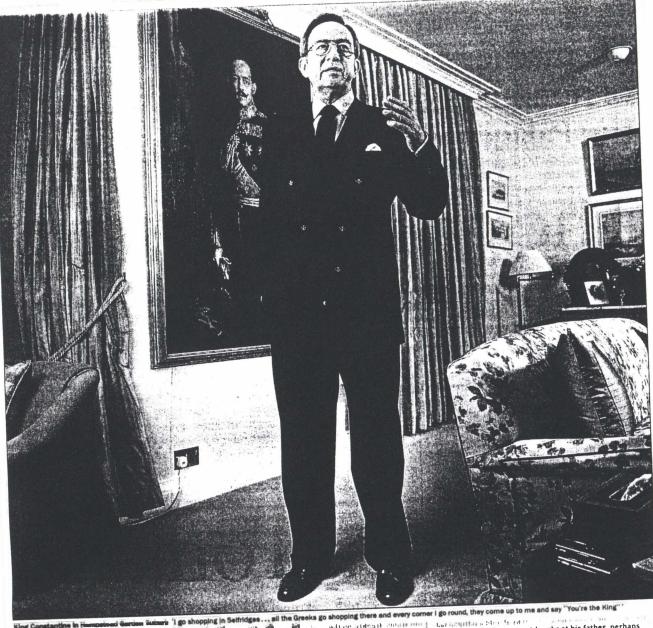

which has an official, rather than a family, feel to it. The tables are groaning with photographs of European royalty, most of whom are his relatives. His sister is Queen Sofia of Spain and his wife Queen Anne-Marie, is the sister of Queen Margrethe of Denmark They have five children, ranging in age from 14 to 35. His eldest son Pavlos is married to Marie-Chantal Miller, the daughter of the billionaire Robert Miller. On the side table between us is a photograph of Prince William as a small boy, dressed in a sailor suit. King Constantine is his god-father. "He's an excellent boy, very sensible, he's got a wonder ful sense of humour, he's hardworking, full of fun Constantine happily reels through the interlinking godparentage. "I'm godfather to William, Charles is godfather to my second son, William is god father to my grandson and the Queen is godmother to my youn-gest daughter."

It has been said that he is so close to both the Queen and the Prince of Wales that he played a crucial role in persuading the Queen to accept Camilla Parker Bowles as her son's mistress Certainly, it was at Constantine's 60th birthday party this summer. held at Highgrove by Prince Charles, that the two women came face to face for the first time in decades, a manoeuvre involving almost military plan ning, Constantine, naturally rules out any suggestion that he was an intermediary. "I know them all, but that is none of my business," he says firmly, mean ing, I suspect, that it is really none of my business.

He is very courteous while remaining completely in charge. When I ask him where he would like me to sit, he says: "Wherever you would be most comfortable." adding "Probably there," pointing to a specific cor-ner of a sofa. And when his aides laughs at his father, perhaps begin to cough and shuffle, signalling an end to the interview, he says: "I think I'm being told that I've taken up too much told that I've taken up too much of your time."

Constantine talks easily and fluently, with a marked Greek accent, and a deep voice underscored with decades of smoking strong Pallas cigarettes. He insists that he would rather have his property returned to him than to receive financial compensation, which would put a burden on Greek taxpayers. The European Court has given Greece six months to come up with an offer

Greece six months to come up with an offer IIe says that he would love to live in Greece again "I just desperately want to go back to Greece ... Every Greek is home-sick. They always long to go home again" In fact he has only returned twice to Greece since he was overthrown in 1967, once in 1981 for the funeral of his mother and once on a family holiday in 1993 that ended with Greek warships that ended with Greek warships that ended with Greek warships shadowing his yacht. It was after this visit that the late Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou stripped the King of his Greek citizenship, passport and properties. The government also insists on referring to him as Constantine Glucksburg, an abbreviation of Denmark's royal house of Schleswig-Holstein-Souderburg-Glucksburg, from Souderburg-Glucksburg, from which King Constantine is descended.

But he has clung steadfastly to his life, insisting that he has no surname. "It's not a title any more. It's an identification of who I am. Most royal families. have some kind of a surname We don't." Constantine was 23 hen his father died and he became King. Three years later, the colonels seized power in a military coup. "The 21st of April, 1967, was definitely the worst day of my life. It's a horrible, horrible feeling to be head of state and up until midnight it's a free democratic country. Then overnight everybody's under arrest, locked up and the army's taken over."

taken over."
Yet it is sometimes said that Yet it is sometimes said that Constantine is the author of his own misfortune. Some say that if he had shown a firmer hand, like, say, his brother-in-law King Juan Carlos of Spain who saw off a similar coup in 1981, he might have remained on the throne. I ask him if he feels he did everything he could circumstances. You have your have remained on the throne. I ask him if he feels he did everything he could.

"I'm always very intrigued when people say I should have done more, but they should tell me what they think I should have done. I'm certainly not going to analyse what happened in 1967 to you because I don't think we have enough food for dinner here." It is only midday so he is suggesting that it would take at least eight hours.

"The main point is that my staff were arrested and beaten up, my house was surrounded, there were no communications — in Spain they didn't touch the communications, everybody was free to move around and it was daytime — in Greece, it happened at night. I felt I had to find a way to solve the problem without bloodshed. Some people say 'Why didn't you do a Gandhi?' But if I did a Gandhi, and sat down passively and did nothing, there would have been bloodshed."

Arresting the leaders was out bloodshed. Arresting the leaders was out of the question, he says. "If I went up to them and said 'You

'I'm godfather to William, Charles is godfather to my second son, William is godfather to my grandson and the Oueen is godmother to my youngest daughter'

whole life in front of you and a very young family .... "There is a shock to the system when you have a very important job and people refer to important job and people refer to you, they're telephoning you to say 'Do we do this or that?', and 'What do you think about this?' Then from one day to the next there's nothing there. Nobody cares any more.' He left the country with his wife and first two children.

are under arrest, they would just have laughed."

Within hours, he was signing decrees for the junta. Nine months later, he organised a countercoup that failed, prompting him to flee into exile in Italy. He spent seven years in Rome, and in 1974, after the military regime disintegrated, the monarchy was rejected in a referendum by a 69 per cent majority. "When you are young, it is much easier to adapt to circumstances. You have your circumstances. You have your life was a sumptuous as they life are not as sumpt laughs at his father, pernaps embarrassed at this outburst. But after school, Constantine went into the Armed Forces and "theatre went way out of the window" Now he fills his days dealing with his correspondence — over 40,000 letters a year —

Certainly the trappings of his life are not as sumptuous as they once were. An avid yachtsman, who won a gold medal in the 1960 Olympic Games, he says he no longer sails. "It's quite expensive to have a boat and I can't do that now." But he has never had to sell the family jewels, which reputedly include a fabulous collection of rubies and emeralds from his great-grandmother Oueen Olga.

from his great-grandmother
Queen Olga.
If he had not been born to kingship, he says he would like to have become a journalist or an actor "I always wanted to go into the theatre."
"He was a very good Mark Antony," says one of the men invigilating the interview, who, it turns out, is an old school chum.
With a theatrical flourish, King Constanting immediately throws imes. Woe to the hand that shed this costly blood!"

His second son, Nikolaos, who is also sitting in on the interview.

— over 40,000 letters a year — and receiving Greek students and businessimen. He says every Greek he has ever met has had nothing but warm words for him. "You can come with me one day if you want to, to ... what's that place called? Self, Self..." One of his aides proinpts him. one of his aides prompts him.
"Selfridges." "Yes Selfridges. I Certainly the trappings of ife are not as sumptuous as they note were. An avid yachtsman, who won a gold medal in the 1960 Dlympic Games, he says he no longer sails: "It's quite expensive to have a boat and I can't do that now." But he has never had to sell the family jewels, which reputedly include a fabulous collection of rubies and emeralds from his great-grandmother Queen Olga.

If he had not been born to kingship, he says he would like to have become a journalist or an actor. "I always wanted to go into the theatre." "He was a very good Mark Antony." says one of the men invigilating the interview, who, it turns out, is an old school chum. With a theatrical flourish. King Constantine immediately throws himself into the role: "Oh pardon me thou bleeding piece of earth, "That I am meek and gentle with these butchers.

Thou art the ruins of the noblest man That ever lived in the tide of times.

We to the hand that shed this worth bleed!" "What does he feel? He thinks and the feel? He thinks and the beding province of the feel of the hand that shed this worth bleed!" "What does he feel? He thinks and the bleed!" "What does he feel? He thinks and the bleed!" He thinks and the bleed in the tide of the bleed!" He thinks and the bleed!" He thinks and what does he feel? He thinks about this for a few seconds: feel extremely patient."